

Mavidis Aristotelis is a PhD candidate in the supply chain management department of the International University of Greece in Katerini. His study is on electronic public procurement and emerging technologies in Industry 4.0. Recently has published as co-author relevant research article in MDPI. He worked for four years as a permanent civil servant in secondary vocational education in economics and management and received relative excellence in 2012 for his contribution to youth entrepreneurship. For the last ten years, he has been working as an administrative and economic officer in a regional administration service of the Ministry of Education. He has completed his graduate studies in the Business Administration department of the Technological Educational Institute of Serres and the International and European Studies department of the University of Macedonia in Greece. The postgraduate studies were completed in Logistics and Optimization at the University of Portsmouth. His postgraduate thesis concerned the application of lean management principles in the TITAN cement industry. He has received additional training in modern information systems, public accounting and IT project management. Additionally, He organized and supervised reorganizing the warehouses of the Municipality of Stavroupoli, Thessaloniki and Katerini as a scientific advisor to the mayor and as a project team member of TEI Katerini, respectively. Furthermore, he participated in logistics-related conferences and wrote articles on the same subject in professional journals. His research interests and working experiences refer to emerging technologies of Industry 4.0, information systems, supply chain management, public procurement, public administration, international relations and education.